SUGGESTED ANSWER

It crossed his mind that he should call Petre again and tell him that they would be leaving for the front again at dawn, so he must not forget anything there... At the same time, however, he realised that he was afraid of being left alone with his own thoughts. He was ashamed of feeling that / that he felt that way, but he could not stop himself, and it was only out of a desire to hide his fear that he kept thinking about Petre, as if in doing so he might drive the fear away. He understood that everything was over, and he regretted that it had ended like this. How he wished that everything had been different!
